The braking system is made up of the ABS module and the ABS sensors. The ABS system is responsible for helping to prevent the car's wheels from locking during intense braking. The sensors, on the other hand, work to detect the speed of the wheels and send signals to the module to pump the brakes when the vehicle is skidding or loses traction.

Most ABS modules do have bleeding valves, but a lot of times these aren't enough to get all the air out. Depending on where the air is trapped though will determine how hard it is to bleed the ABS module. The first thing to do to bleed the ABS module is to start the car or turn the key to where the battery is on.
