into position, the American commanders had to rely on rear area troops already in the Ardennes. Many of these were corps and army engineer battalions, scattered throughout the area in company, platoon, and even squad-size groups, and these small groups of engineers played important roles in the Battle of the Bulge.

Engineers in the Battle of the Bulge - JSTOR

It was when Patton took over command of II Corps that the American performance improved greatly, notably at El Guetar. Also, American troops certainly did NOT ‘run’ during the Bulge or at Bataan. Indeed, their heroic stands at the Elsenborn Ridge, Bastogne, and St. Vith blunted the German attack enough to where the OB West CinC, Von Rundstedt, concluded that after only 72 hours that the ...
