Food addiction causes people to eat compulsively, even when they are not hungry. This constant overeating can be categorised as a behavioural addiction, similar to the addictions experienced by drug or alcohol abusers. Eating our favourite foods activates the reward centres of our brains, causing elevated levels

According to Hoebel, “food addiction” is a plausible concept because the brain pathways that evolved to respond to natural rewards are also activated by addictive drugs. Thus sugar, as a substance that releases opioids and dopamine, might also be expected to have addictive potential. Food and Addiction is ambitious in scope. It broadly covers the
